Container.Recently I was comparing the Win98 VM I had with two Win2K VMs. The latter, in order to improve the GUI experience (Yay!), asked me if I would like to take an additional test. The choice was between XP and Win2K, and I chose XP without hesitation. I decided that I had nothing to lose by trying it. I logged into the new VM and began the installation. Unfortunately, I received a System Error Code 0x8007007B. My immediate reaction was: "Oh, no, I screwed up. What can I do now?" Luckily, there was a reasonably-informed Windows expert in the house, and he ran me through a bunch of troubleshooting steps. Here's the interesting part: the error code was accompanied by a message that stated that the operating system install had succeeded. But it wasn't true! The various Windows experts I consulted all pointed out that the filesystem has to be empty before you can install any operating system on a new hard drive. Apparently, if you'd installed the XP on a drive that had anything in it (no, not even a restore point), you would have had this same problem. My conclusion is that the Microsoft Support team failed to do their job of ensuring that all of the relevant systems were in good order. They somehow forgot to check the case for the spare drive in the event that a new drive is put into the system. This is no laughing matter, as I'm dealing with a customer that had to send me to the store to replace this defective drive. The scenario of XP being installed on a drive with files on it, leading to this error message, is exactly what I would expect to happen if the installation were aborted. The takeaway lesson is that if you're installing any operating system, no matter how trivial, ensure that the target drive is empty. If in doubt, do some rudimentary checking to see if it is. Now, I'm fully aware of the dangers of running a VM for the purpose of testing. If you're

Key features:..Richard Pacheco, a 27-year-old Spanish immigrant in New York, is a pretty happy guy. He works, he dates, he even buys his girlfriend ice cream — from his bank account, of course. But even he admits that his financial picture is a little murky. As he works two jobs, at his current gig at a pizzeria and as a college professor, he lives paycheck to paycheck and is a little worried about how he'll pay the rent next month. "I feel very stressed," Pacheco said, "but I'm still happy." Pacheco is among the many immigrants who are leaving the United States in increasing numbers, especially after President Donald Trump signed a series of executive orders in January aimed at cracking down on illegal immigration. He's one of millions of immigrants who have already left the country, and he's not alone. Between 2009 and 2014, the number of immigrants leaving the United States grew from 5.5 million to 7.7 million, according to data from the Pew Research Center. The highest number of immigrants leaving in 2014 was at the same time as the highest number of arrivals, in 2012. Pacheco didn't leave because of the new laws, but others left because of a lot of the rhetoric about immigration that Trump has expressed since his campaign. Despite Trump's harsh rhetoric about illegal immigrants, most immigrants come to the United States legally, and most people who leave the country are non-citizens. According to Pew's numbers, 61 percent of immigrants leaving the country in 2014 came to the United States legally. (Non-citizens can only legally work here temporarily, or if they are citizens. Permanent legal immigration is highly restricted.) But the trend in the last few years is for the number of
