A tank, in military jargon, is a tracked vehicle which uses a thick bed of steel plates to provide some protection for its crew against shrapnel and machine gun fire. The U.S. Army has been adopting the tank's design since the mid-sixties, with the M60, M60A1, M60A2 and M60A3 versions and variants. One of the most modern examples are the M1 Abrams. Other countries use foreign designs. Tanks started as armoured cars, with the French Char 2C and German Panzer I and Panzer II both armed with machine guns. German designers built the Panzer II under the hull of the Panzer I, and the Panzer III under the hull of the Panzer II. Pz. German tanks generally appeared in the late 1930s and took part in most World War II campaigns. Many German tanks were small and light, with light armour to maximise mobility. A small number of large-scale designs were intended to meet every need, such as the V-1 flying bomb. The German Panzer I used the same gun as the Panzer II. They were armed with a 37 mm SA 34 gun. The German Panzer II used a KwK. In the first half of the war they were used mainly as reconnaissance tanks, but towards the end they were used for tank battalions and tank units. In contrast to the German heavy tanks, the majority of the French tanks were medium tanks. One of the best was the Char B2. The German tanks of the Panzer III family were heavy tanks intended to counter the British Conqueror and American Sherman tanks. A series of heavier tanks were built, including the Panzer IV. Later a series of British tank destroyers were mounted with the same gun. More armour was added on later models, including the British Matilda. In the United States the 2d92ce491b
