'This is your first critical error in your script,' he told me, and pointed to the text box where I had typed 'adobe' in 'White Rabbit'. I had made a simple mistake, but it was a mistake that would have given me trouble for the rest of my life. I have a horrible memory, so I knew that I would make a mistake at some point. At least I'd been with the same writing and proofreading team for three years now, so I had to know that there were other guys out there who had the same problem. 'In a script, when you're talking about a white rabbit, you use "-rabbit" to make it plural,' he said, 'but "-ry" is the plural form of "-ry". It means it's another rabbit. You can't mix the two.' Those are the things that make writing such a difficult job, and I can't imagine the other things that I have done wrong. I don't know why, but whenever I try to explain to someone how to write a screenplay, or I'm sitting in a room trying to explain to someone how to create a character, I always make the same mistake. 'It's just a typo,' they say, but it's not a typo. It's a major mistake in the script that can ruin a movie. Or worse, it's a mistake that can ruin your career. 'I don't understand,' they say. 'Why don't you try it again? It's only a few hours of work, right?'
