While temperatures have been going up in central and southern Europe, they have dropped in Scandinavia, especially in Sweden and Norway. This is not only a strange natural event but also a very important one, because the polar vortex is an essential part of the climate system. According to calculations of the Norwegian Meteorological Institute, temperatures have dropped in the period between the weekend of January 20th and January 23rd. And the depth and the intensity of the vortex will also determine the duration of the cold period. "The cold period in Europe can last for several weeks, if the high pressure that normally lies in front of the vortex moves off the continent," says Mette Sønderby, head of the climate center at the institute. "This high pressure plays a big role in the jet stream, and changes in this jet stream can last for weeks." A drop in temperatures also affects the North Atlantic. "We see very high pressure in the North Atlantic, which also spreads towards the North Pole and moves the jet stream 2d92ce491b
