Newcastle City Council has put £2m on the table for its academy at Sage Gateshead. Campaign group New Schools Network (NSN) said it was the "final chapter" of a "shameful process" where "even a loss" was acceptable. The council said its proposal was "in the best interest" of the city's children. Sage Gateshead - which moved from the city's new free schools system - was due to open in September 2016 but is now operating from a temporary site. The move prompted the foundation school to apply for a permanent location in Gateshead - one of the areas hardest hit by the housing crisis - where it would eventually be replaced by a £120m new school. 'Big kick up the backside' The council had also said it was "not seeking to lose money" on the academy, which has been teaching children since 2012, but was looking at other options. It has applied for funding from the government's new free schools programme and has asked parents to put their children in a system it believes will offer better education and offer more places for students. NSN said it was appalled by the council's decision and criticised councillors for failing to listen to the 2d92ce491b
