Shire has confirmed that its neurological migraine treatment Praluent has received the most critical new drug application (NDA) review by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA). The critical NDA review concluded that a new formulation of Praluent that was approved in 2012 continues to have a clinically meaningful benefit for some patients with the most severe migraine attacks. "The FDA's decision to complete a 'critical NDA' review of our Praluent migraine treatment reinforces the favorable opinions and feedback we've received over the last year about Praluent," said Pat McCarthy, CEO of Shire. "The FDA assessment and the subsequent critical NDA review reflects the benefits that Praluent has demonstrated in a very difficult-to-treat population and indicate the potential that Praluent has as a potential treatment option for patients who are unresponsive to other migraine preventive therapies." Shire said Praluent has been under NDA review for more than 10 years and the company has received positive feedback from the FDA throughout the process. The positive NDA review is expected to be posted to the FDA website in the next 60 to 90 days. Solid ink or phase change ink printing systems suffer from two technical problems that limit system quality, reliability and reliability. The first problem is a plug up of the heater plate in the print head, which results in the heater plate not firing any droplets at all. This has a profound effect on print quality in that it results in blank (white) spots in the printed image. The second problem is when the ink is in contact with the heater plate, the ink can adhere to the heater plate and make the plate unable to fire. This can result in the entire print head becoming inoperable. These two problems are addressed by placing the ink supply in a sealed compartment that is vented into the print head. This compartment is usually closed with a rubber septum, which is pierced by a needle to bring the ink up to the print head. As the ink supply needs to be replenished during the life of the printer, the ink supply needle is periodically replaced. 2d92ce491b
