A non-destructive method for the estimation of the quantity of pulp in teeth is described in which the quantity of the dentine in a tooth sample can be determined from the force exerted by a scanning probe microscope tip on the surface of the tooth. The quantity of dentine used as a basis for the estimation is determined by measuring the force measured at the base of the root of an extracted tooth. As the tip of the scanning probe microscope is scanned over the tooth sample, the force exerted by the tip on the tooth surface is plotted as a function of position along the sample surface. The point on the curve which corresponds to the force measured at the base of the root is the force required to cause the tip to penetrate into the dentine. This force can be determined from the slope of the line of best fit through the data points measured at points within the root. An initial calibration procedure is required to determine the distance from the tip to the base of the root, and a calibration factor can be determined for each tooth sample by calculating the force measured at the base of the root for different tip to sample distances. Once the calibration procedure is complete, the force required to penetrate the dentine is used to estimate the quantity of pulp within the root. The ratio of the force required to penetrate the dentine to the force required to penetrate the enamel provides an indication of the quantity of pulp within the tooth.The Future of Gene Therapy: Current Status and Future Directions. Gene therapy has had great success in treating a range of diseases and disorders but remains the target of intense research and development because of its complexity and challenges. One of the most serious challenges facing gene therapy is the ability to transfect a sufficient number of cells to a sufficient number of chromosomal loci for the desired therapeutic effect.
