Tag Archives: Peter Block Here is the story of a ministry that is attempting to touch the hearts of the dying, and see if, in so doing, we can't touch their souls. "I was looking for someone to talk to" My friend Heather and I walked down the hall at the children's hospital, our small group leader Janese in tow. In one of the waiting rooms we found a tiny little guy curled up in a chair. He seemed to have settled in for a long stay. He was so small, it was hard to tell if he was a boy or a girl, or just a newborn. I watched in awe as he breathed in and out, growing stronger each time. How does a person go about finding someone to talk to? How does one connect with a six-week old? Heather took a deep breath, called her husband and told him to bring their camera. We prayed for a miracle of sorts. Something to help take that baby from just a tiny newborn to a child full of hopes and dreams, hopes and dreams he hadn't even realized yet. "You are so beautiful" With our hearts in our throats, Janese and I approached the boy. A nurse checked him over to be sure he was fine, and then she gave him over to us. He stopped crying as soon as his mom took him from the room, but we could tell by his smile that we were making a difference. We realized we were far more equipped to see that, to 2d92ce491b
