With a vortex-shedding orifice plate positioned to present an orifice to the fluid, a pressure differential is established across the orifice, and the pressure drop across the orifice provides a flow indication. One such device is shown in U.S. Pat. No. 3,915,392 to Tsutsui et al., which discloses a water flow meter of the orifice plate type in which the orifice plate is positioned on a common tube in communication with a flow channel and an exhaust port of the meter, the tubes and channel being enclosed by a shroud which restricts flow through the channels and the exhaust port. The flow is vortical and the flow rate is a function of the Reynolds number. The Tsutsui et al. device requires an outlet at the lower end of the 70238732e0

(Or is the Lake District in that gap? Dunno.) I know that the Lake District was once part of Cumberland, and although that was a separate county from Lancashire, it would seem that there was once some kind of land border. And I also know that London itself wasn't always in England. Now I don't know what land it was originally. In some sense it's not really a part of England either. I know the site I live on has been settled for thousands of years, maybe longer. (Unlike the United States) But it's been a part of England for a long time, certainly since the Normans. I'm not asking for an official definition. I'm just trying to get a sense of how "English" is defined here and how borders are drawn in general. I'm hoping someone with a better knowledge of history will enlighten me. I'm not asking for an official definition. England is a country made up of a number of regions, and there is usually one capital city. That said, most of the time when you hear English or English spoken, it's people in England. Well, except for the fact that, yes, we have mountains but don't have anything at all between the Lake District and the mountains. (Or is the Lake District in that gap? Dunno.) Yes,
