The use of experimental animal models has been essential in the investigation of new concepts in bone infection and orthopedic surgery. However, the high number of animals needed per experiment raises questions about the study of bacterial interactions in the host. In a study comparing two different abscess models, we observed that the polymicrobial abscess developed later in some animals. We therefore tested whether a modified polymicrobial abscess model could be used to improve the experimental conditions. The animals were anaesthetized, their hind limbs were shaved, and normal saline was infiltrated into the soft tissues of the left hind limb. The skin was incised and a subcutaneous abscess cavity was developed. The following four groups of six animals were injected with: Escherichia coli, Streptococcus pyogenes, Pseudomonas aeruginosa, and normal saline into the abscess cavity and into the skin of the left hind limb. In Group A, the microorganisms were separated by syringes to avoid interaction. In Group B, the microorganisms were mixed in a single injection. In Group C, the microorganisms were injected into the skin, and the cavity was inoculated with P. aeruginosa. In Group D, the animals were injected with P. aeruginosa in the abscess cavity and E. coli into the skin. At 4 h, the animals were sacrificed, and the abscess cavities and surrounding tissues were stained with hematoxylin and eosin. Microbial growth was significantly higher in Group B and Group C. However, the microbial growth in Group B was less than that in Group A. At 7 days, the bone was stained with toluidine blue and was analyzed by light microscopy. Bone infection was detected in all animals. This model might be useful in the study of polymicrobial infection and antibiotic therapy.Field of the Invention This invention relates to a glass cleaning composition for glass parts such as glass vessels and, in particular
